"We should do what we don't know"

By Grady Harp

Mitchell Johnson continues to be one of the more erudite minds in contemporary art as well as being tremendously successful in both abstraction and representation painting. COLOR LESSONS is once again a highly sophisticated book/catalogue in a growing line of fine books about the art and mind of Mitchell Johnson. In this book filled with richly reproduced images of Johnson's work there is a conversation between the artist and Peter Campion, poet, writer and teacher at Stanford University - an interesting re-visit from a catalogue interview between these two articulate men from 2005. At that time Mitchell Johnson was not a household word or on the lips of fellow artists: now he is.

The 'why' of the increased visibility of the art of Mitchell Johnson is in part attributed to the multiple exhibitions of his art both in the USA and in Europe: it is in larger part due to the increasing sophistication of his art. Johnson has always moved comfortably between his signature abstract paintings - singularly beautiful and majestic blocks of color so sensitively juxtaposed that a quick glance is soon altered into a prolonged examination: there appear to be stories within the colors that seduce the viewer to explore - and his seemingly straightforward scenes of houses in landscapes, figures in groups, vistas of untainted land in Denmark, Tuscany, France, Cape Cod, and of course his own home in Northern California. He gathers palette ideas in every location that finds his visit and then creates from those new parcels of visual data even more complex works in studio, sometimes built as blocks of color that construct his representational or as simply color for color's sake that inform his abstract paintings.

In this exceptional catalogue the reader will be exposed to almost every thought plane the artist explores. But the images where he willingly shares the marriage between abstraction and representation - paintings such as 'Giant Truro', 2008-2011 and even more obviously in the stunning panorama 'Near Clecy', 2008-2011 - is yet another aspect of the humanity of Mitchell Johnson. No secrets or occult dichotomies here, but instead simple explanations of how he thinks and traverses the path between seemingly simple blocks of color and sharing places of houses and land and people he has noted.

In the well-transcribed interview Johnson contrasts Aristophanes ('Let each man exercise the art he knows') with fellow artist Paul Resika ('We have to keep trying to do what we don't know how to do'), and after taking the journey through this spectrum of art as beautifully presented in this catalogue, the path Johnson is taking is obvious! He simply grows more sophisticated in technique in a way that brings his audience deeper into the canvases he creates. Grady Harp, May 11

mitchel johson; color lessons

By M. Bowles

Mitchell Johnson's 'Color Lessons' is a book every artist, collector, novice, could learn from.. from his instinct about color, to the definition of color. The ability he shows to go back and forth and the inbetween, representational work and abstraction with color theory being used as a vocabulary...The unique application seems effortless, yet to study his work, you realize the depth of this artist. It is all there in every painting. His talent is immense. His knowledge is immense and the way he explains it in a relaxed manner, makes just more comfortable, and as relatable as his paintings. The more you look at this work the more you are able to discover. mark bowles
